effectiveness, and safety of catheter ablation in the Medicare population. In the general population, there was moderate evidence that RFA is superior to medical therapy for enhancing patient freedom from recurrence of atrial arrhythmias in both the short and long term regardless of AF type, but reablation was common.

The mortality risk of catheter ablation is believed to be < 1:2000 for most types of ablation. The benefit of having a catheter ablation is that your heart rhythm disturbance is potentially cured and your symptoms (palpitations, fainting, fatigue, breathlessness etc) resolved. This is possible in the vast majority of cases.

In some instances, the catheter ablation and EPS procedures are no longer considered distinct procedures and therefore not reportable with separate codes. with heart failure who had drug-refractory atrial fibrillation. Rottlaender et al (2009) stated that cryothermal ablation is a new method in cardiac electrophysiology for the percutaneous catheter ablation of cardiac arrhythmias. Cryothermal mapping allows functional evaluation of a particular site prior to ablation.

G. UHA considers cardiac catheter ablation procedures experimental and investigational for all other indications, including any of the following arrhythmias, as there is insufficient evidence in the peer reviewed medical literature of the effectiveness of cardiac catheter ablation for these indications: 1.

Catheter Ablation Therapy. Catheter ablation has been used to treat heart rhythm disorders for more than 25 years. This procedure targets the origin of the VT by placing a long, thin wire or catheter into the heart chambers through the veins of the leg.

CATHETER ABLATION OF VENTRICULAR TACHYCARDIA

In catheter ablation, electromagnetic energy is delivered to the myocardium via transvenous catheters to create thermal lesions. Various energy sources have been used for catheter ablation of cardiac arrhythmias. Radiofrequency (RF) energy is currently the most commonly used energy source in catheter ablation of cardiac arrhythmias.

Yes, the Electrophysiology Study and Catheter Ablation procedure will be performed during the same session. Once we locate exactly where your abnormal rhythm is located by the Electrophysiology Study, we will apply radiofrequency energy to this area during the radiofrequency Catheter Ablation procedure.
